GROWING SCHOOLS

Librarians as Professional Developers

When librarians work as professional developers, they can build relationships and develop deeper capacity within individual teachers, who can then share that increased expertise with their students. Professional development offers a nimble, scalable, and more efficient way to bring library instruction to every student.

School administrators are recognizing that school librarians are ideal to lead professional development because they service the entire school network, from the students and faculty to families and the community. As a national downturn in educational funding is diminishing districts' ability to optimally staff libraries, investing energy in professional development is a sound strategy to bring information literacy skills to every student—especially in buildings with part-time librarians, or districts with only a single librarian of record.

Debbie Abilock, cofounder of NoodleTools, Inc., an online platform for teaching academic research, speaks internationally and consults in schools based on over 25 years as a school administrator, curriculum coordinator, librarian, and ICT director.

Kristin Fontichiaro is clinical assistant professor at the University of Michigan's School of Information. Formerly, she was an elementary school librarian and staff development facilitator for the Birmingham Public Schools in Michigan and a classroom teacher.

Violet H. Harada is professor in the Library and Information Science Program at the University of Hawaii at Manoa. Her recent published works include Libraries Unlimited's Assessing for Learning: Librarians and Teachers As Partners and Librarians As Learning Specialists: Meeting the Learning Imperative for the 21st Century.
